What do coaches, surgical supervisors, music teachers, and instructional leaders have in common? They all use frequent and effective feedback as their primary method to improve another person's practice. Even in the most successful schools, we rarely get to hire master teachers already formed; the best instructional leaders coach teachers until the masters emerge.

In this workshop, participants will learn multiple strategies to increase their feedback to supervisees and reduce their resistance. Videos will be used to demonstrate model strategies. In addition, we will also discuss to shift your time from low-yield evaluation reports to more high-yield effective feedback that increases the quality of teaching.

After discussing how supervisors can improve "giving feedback", we will also examine multiple reasons why educators may resist "receiving feedback". Based on the work of Doug Stone and Sheila Heen (Thanks for Feedback), we will talk about three triggers that can block educator learning and how you can prepare for resistance: the identity triggers, the relationship triggers, and the truth triggers.
